Aperture Health, Inc. Executes LOI to Acquire Doctors on Call

FAIRFIELD, N.J., June 18, 2012 Aperture Health, Inc. (OTC APRE) announced today that it has executed a Letter of Intent to acquire Doctors on Call, one of the largest in-home medical practices in New York City. Doctors on Call, consisting of over 35 physicians and physician extenders, is devoted to the care of the frail and/or homebound elderly throughout New York City. The Center for Medicare & Medicaid Innovations has selected Doctors on Call to participate in the Independence at Home Demonstration Project. Among sixteen (16) participating practices nationwide, Doctors on Call was the only medical group in New York City to be selected for this three (3) year project, which is aimed to improve the lives of patients living with chronic illnesses by providing quality medical care right in the patient's own home.

Independence at Home Demonstration Project

New Study of At Home Care Services Could Mean Benefits For Seniors

Published June 12, 2012

Some of the top home care providers around the country are participating in a new study that could lead senior citizens to reduced costs and new advances in at home services. The Independence at Home Demonstration Project is a government study that launched on June 1st and will continue research until May of 2015. The test will cover several key factors to determine the benefits of care at home to chronically ill seniors and other patients that can't practically receive treatment outside of their homes.

The convenience and flexibility provided by at home services are already known to provide benefits to many patients. Although home care is a necessity for many patients, this new research aims to find out if these services can provide more successful treatment results and lower costs to those who need it most. The chronically ill who have no alternatives will benefit from this research directly, but another element of the study may offer savings to those capable of seeking out-home health care.

Regular check-ups and preventative care pose a problem among many older people who may not require health care at home. In an effort to decrease emergency room visits and sudden health risks, this research may reduce the cost of medical care to patients such as these. This could allow care at home to be offered to patients who may not be chronically ill, but could provide them with better preventative standards to reduce developing health issues. If home health care standards were extended to prevention health care, then it could potentially save money for the patients and medical facilities.

The mental and social well being of home patients is another area of concern. This new study will not completely eliminate the need for a primary care physician to visit the patients' homes. The living conditions and mental state of patients will also be examined. This is very important to the success of the research for more reasons than one. Poor living standards can be a major contributing factor in a patient's successful treatment. Reporting these conditions as well as the finances and mental state of the patients could play an important role in the study.

By examining every factor that can contribute to the success of home care, this research could provide reduced expenses to patients and care practitioners alike. In addition to cost reduction, the test may increase the success of preventative health care and treatment to chronically ill seniors. The tests and research being conducted may be long overdue, but the results will likely make at home services more successful and available to those who need it most.
